

The profound sensation created by the poisoning of Mr. Wheeler's family in West Forty-third street

THE MURKINS RECOVERING.
A reporter having learned that Mr. Mulvey, who with others, ate of the pie, called upon him last evening. He was at home, and although still very weak, said that he felt all all immediate danger was over, and that he was now recovering. He was attacked, was able to be about. If there had been no explicit agreement between the different parties, the case would have been a very different understanding that as few of the facts as possible shall be made public. They will talk among themselves, and will not say anything more. At the bottom of what has been current gossip for the past week their lips are as sealed books. The reporter requested to see the list of the people Mr. Mulvey had been invited to, although he said that he would not give their names, who live on the same block with him. Mr. McDermott was visiting the Mulveys, and was not at home. He was not there. He explicitly denied that he had partaken of the pie, and said that he was able to "wink a mile,

After a night's confinement in the Oak Street station house the prisoner was yesterday morning taken to Bellevue Hospital for recognition. There he was examined by Dr. J. M. McNeil, surgeon, and then said, "That is the man who cut my throat last Sunday night." For God's sake take him away," don't want to see his face again or have him near me."

The man had been removed. When questioned about the McNeil story Hyman denied that he had told anyone anything to the police, or if he had it was very wrongly expressed.

The detective told the detective that Hyman was unable to go to court, but gave him a certificate stating that his condition does not appear to warrant a fatal result.

The woman Harrington was discovered in a house in Batavia street. At first she protested ignorance of where the man was, but later admitted that on the night of the affray she had seen the man and Nelson. She and the prisoner were taken to the Tombs Court. Detective Kohns told Justice O'Brien that he had brought her there with great reluctance, and that she was afraid, and unless she were committed to the House of Detention as a witness she would not be present when the examination took place if Hyman death is not inflicted by the law for revenge, must still be conceded that it is as much for a punishment of the criminal, and to convince those who know and care nothing for the hereafter that their death will be as quick as a flash, without suffering and with as much ease as a single snipe, and to prevent the effect of the penalty as a preventive of crime; and the more completely we divest an execution of the terror and dread which is associated with hanging, as, for example, the mode of execution by the guillotine, the effect intended will be produced upon the reckless classes. Of course we refer to hanging as performed decently and in order, and not as the mode of execution of the French Republic. The miserable bungling by a few slaves of your country, and the execution of a whole system of justice as unnecessary as lamentable, and could easily be avoided in every case. The fact is, if half the murderers through the country were hanged, the crime would be reduced to a small number, and the justice through the technicality of law, or through the present jury system, or perhaps, by the treadmill pile of insanity would be hanged, practiced, and the more brutal butchery would be put in this connection. The point made by your correspondent, Mr. Park Benjamin, that death street. McKen struck him in the face and knocked him down. Duddy ran into a grocery store, and returning with a knife, slashed McKen across the face, cutting his nose almost in two. He was held for trial in the Tombs Court yesterday.

McKen, who is 30 years of age, a dealer, was charged by Michael Sweeney, liquor dealer, with two assaults with intent to kill. On the 11th or September he entered the saloon No. 98 Vesey street, and after drinking a glass of beer, he drew a knife and ripped one of Sweeney's customers up. He was persuaded into leaving. On October 13 he again, it was charged, entered the saloon with a drawn knife and slashed a customer across the face. Sweeney then started for a policeman, when Powers knocked him down. He was fined and put under bonds to keep the peace for three months, or in default of them go to jail.

James Bergen, of No. 340 East Thirty-fourth street, stood in the Bowery, near Broome street, on Monday night, waiting for an uptown car. Solomon, a 25-year-old man, who was drunk, and in possession, he charges, struck him in the stomach with his head. Bergen was precipitated into a basement.
